ROBERT HENRI

ROBERT HENRI, in American art, stands for what Manet stood for in French art, and what Goya stood for in Spanish art. He is a strong character, and a powerful influence; a man who has stood like a rock for his ideals. He is a born fighter and he has always fought for individuality in art. He believes that what an artist has to express is the vital thing; that technique may be important, but that it should never be an end in itself.

Henri is a student, always. His eye and his mind's eye are always on the alert for new discoveries. Life means evolution to him; it means destruction and creation. He is equally attuned to the delicate, and to the brutal, to the spiritual and to the material.

Like Bernard Shaw, he faces life squarely. Both of these men love reality, but they abhor photographic representation. They are neither of them portrait painters in the accepted sense; rather they are creators of their own race of people. A mere likeness is a vulgar thing to them: they are after the quintessence of the spirit. Sometimes they fail, and their work is wooden, but when they succeed it is electrified with real creative genius. They both love humanity, but they love their own people more.

It has been said of Henri that some of his earlier work shows the influence of other artists. This is true, and it shows that he has always been a real, 'live, growing artist. It is the great man who can utilize knowledge from many different sources, selecting from each that which he can weave into the fabric of his own personality. It is he who realizes that he must manipulate one existing substance into ever-changing, plastic forms that will create emotion.

Henri's style is simple, and therein lies its strength. Nothing is painted that should have been left out. When he paints an eye, he may use three brush strokes, or twenty, but there is never any fumbling or uncertainty so far as the end in view is concerned. It is either right or wrong. Either he has failed, and the result is mere paint, or he has succeeded in creating a thing that pulsates with life. This shows how honest the man is. He cannot fake, and he hates pretense.

Perhaps the one quality that dominates in his work is vitality, a vigor that is both intellectual and physical. One is never conscious of any laziness or indecision in his make-up. His jaws are set, he has a grip that tightens rather than loosens.

Henri paints with a broad brush; he paints the essentials, the things that count in art. In his portrait work he is seeking to eliminate the element of time, to achieve universality, and to hint the mysteries of the fourth dimension. To the uncritical and superficial his work may seem unstudied, but the reverse is true. His interest in organization is intense, and each canvas is worked out structurally in a very careful way.

He is alive to what Clive Bell calls "significant form," * that fundamental and profound quality achieved by the early Egyptians, Greeks and Chinese.

* See "Art" by Clive Bell.

His vision is that of the idealist. He is never unkind, and he has a veritable blind spot for blemishes.

He is a great egoist, as every great creator must be, and sees everything from his own intensely personal point of view. He reorganizes all the material for expression within his own inner self, colors it with his own character. It is always white-hot with conviction.

Robert Henri was born in Cincinnati in 1865. He comes of a family for many generations in America, the original stock being French, English and Irish. At first he thought that writing was his forte, but painting soon became the stronger attraction. In 1886, he entered the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts, where he began his studies under Thomas Anshutz, one of the few great teachers of art that we have had in this country. A few years later, he went to Paris, where he studied under Fleury and Bougereau at Juliens. The academic restraint there, however, soon proved too much for him, and we find him on his way to the Louvre, where, to his relief, he found the work of artists who impressed him by their intense reactions to life. The big simplicity of the Spaniards impressed him. He experienced a rebirth; something within him expanded and flowered, and from that moment he knew what great art meant. Later he passed under the influence of the then radical Courbet, Manet and Whistler. Their influence was, however, only temporary. His personality continued to make itself felt until these other influences gradually disappeared, and the character of Henri emerged supreme.

Since those early days, he has always begun a painting as though he were going into battle. He must always either win or lose; there can be no middle ground of mediocre accomplishment. It is this fearlessness that is so attractive in his work. He attacks each new problem with a different spirit, and the result is a different technique in every instance. He has painted many children, but each one of them has been brushed into life in a different way. This varied technique is shown also in his color. Always he is an experimenter, mixing brains and paint.

His portraits of laboring men are astonishing. One feels that he has fairly cut them out of paint with understanding and feeling. In some of them the paint seems to have been driven onto the canvas with terrific force.

His portraits have an air of unstudied alertness, because, in every instance he has done his thinking beforehand. Before he touches brush to canvas, his picture is painted. For it is the vision back of his eyes that he paints, and not the image in front of them. This particular quality is very noticeable in his portraits of Himself and Herself. There is no seemingly laborious execution, but this does not mean that they have been done with ease. Each canvas is a new adventure, and sometimes the peaks are hard to climb.

As a teacher of art, Mr. Henri has few equals. He seems to grasp the possibilities of his students in such a way that he is able to guide them toward an expression of power. He awakens the dormant potentialities in each student, develops his courage, and helps him transfer his own personality to canvas. There is nothing academic about his teaching. He never tries to get his students to put down pretty, senseless lines, or to draw "correctly." He teaches control. Each brush-stroke must express a conviction, must be a valuable link in the organization of his subject. It must be dynamic, whether it be delicate or strong. He teaches that to paint well it is not alone necessary to feel ; one must also think. Great art, according to Robert Henri, is never an accident.
